April 2014: Autodesk released a new release of Autodesk Inventor 2013.net, Autodesk Inventor 2013.net, Autodesk Inventor 2013.net, and Autodesk Inventor.net are for Windows 32-bit, x86.Q: Why do program crash upon exiting? I have a 3rd party software, they send me a version with debug symbols. I built myself a version of it. The debug symbols have no symbols for their own functions (they are in c and c++) the only symbols that are present are for 3rd party libraries that I linked. I used the debug symbols in the version that's built from the binary's c and c++ source code and the library that I used to build it, but for some reason it crashes every time I exit the binary. I can't debug it because the software, those who developed it and the binaries have been decommissioned. So I'm not even given a version to compile or a version to debug it, it's just an executable. So I'm wondering if the binary or code that's crashes when I exit it could contain symbols from this debug symbols. I've read about unresolved symbol a lot of times, usually it indicates that a function used that's not yet present in the binary, is not on the symbol table. But in my case, the binary is already compiled and it have a debug symbols too and the debug symbols are built with the binary of the software. So I should have symbols for the functions that are present in the binary. Does anyone have a clue why it could still crash? A: The crash may be, for example: Call to a not yet present function, in a function that is not yet present in the binary. Accessing uninitialized memory Memory being zero'd out An exception occurs, and one of your functions doesn't deal properly 6d1f23a050
